

Good Global Citizens?

A Scottish Council on Global Affairs Insight

Scottish and English Attitudes to Foreign Policy

December 2023

Dr Claire Duncanson, Dr Timothy Gravelle,
Professor Thomas J Scotto

Address

Scottish Council on Global Affairs
c/o Sir Alexander Stone building
University of Glasgow
Glasgow, G12 8QQ
Scotland

Contact

Head of Operations:
John Edward: john@scga.scot

Form: scga.scot/contact

Online

Website: scga.scot
Twitter/X: scga_scot
Bluesky: scga
Instagram: scga.scot
LinkedIn: the-scga

Table of Contents

Good Global Citizens?

About the Scottish Council on Global Affairs	03
Insight Summary	04
Key Findings and Recommendations	05
About the Poll	06
About the Questions	07
Responses: Militarism, Multilateralism, Global Justice	08-11
Responses: Trade Justice, Economic and Environmental Wellbeing	12-14
Conclusion	15

About Us

The Scottish Council on Global Affairs

01

The Scottish Council on Global Affairs (SCGA) is the first all-Scotland international relations institute providing a hub for collaborative policy-relevant research and a home for informed, non-partisan debate on all areas of international relations and global politics broadly defined.

The Founding Partners are:

- The University of Edinburgh
- The University of Glasgow
- The University of St Andrews

The Council provides a convening space to bring together the public, private and not-for-profit sectors with civil society and academic expertise to encourage dialogue, debate and the dissemination of expertise on issues of global importance.

It looks to forge new relationships and deepen existing ties with universities and civil society in the rest of the United Kingdom as well as with centres of expertise in Europe and across the world.

“Opinion polling on Scottish foreign policy attitudes is rare...”

03

Key Findings and Recommendations

1. Aggregate levels of agreement with a variety of Foreign Policy topics ranging from militarism to placing conditions favouring Human, Women's and Environmental Rights into trade agreements do not differ widely between Scotland and England.
2. Within Scotland, there is polarisation on Foreign Policy topics by respondents' position on the question of Scottish independence and differences are acute on questions concerning use of the military and Britain's colonial legacy.
3. Support for Feminist Foreign Policy priorities varies across topics. Among those surveyed, there is high support for more inclusive trade policies, giving greater thought to human and environmental wellbeing in growth strategies and cooperation with other nations. Respondents are more sceptical of feminist ideas concerning demilitarisation and global redistributions of wealth.
4. Support for principles of a Feminist Foreign Policy trends higher among supporters of Scottish independence, suggesting that the adaptation of these principles by the Scottish SNP-led government accords with the opinions of independence minded voters.

About the Poll

04

How Scots feel about the Scottish Government's (SG) approach to international affairs and whether their attitudes are distinct from their English counterparts is difficult to judge because most British polling includes small numbers of respondents from Scotland.

To overcome this, researchers Dr Claire Duncanson (University of Edinburgh) and Professor Thomas Scotto (University of Glasgow) partnered with SurveyMonkey (assisted by Dr Timothy Gravelle), with funding from the SCGA, to facilitate a specialised foreign policy-focused poll that oversampled Scots.

Considering the SG's feminist approach to foreign policy (FaFP), we also wanted to test what attitudes to a FaFP might be. With many misunderstandings about FaFP, and indeed feminism, we wanted to avoid asking explicitly what people thought about a feminist approach, or about gender, to mitigate against the risk of answers based on misunderstanding the questions, undermining the validity of the results.

This was not a huge hurdle to the research, however, as the questions asked and analyses in Scotto and Gravelle's long standing surveys already enabled us to get at key tenets of a feminist approach.

The survey contained additional questions specially designed to measure key aspects of a FaFP.

About the Questions

05

Feminist Foreign Policy Theory and Traditional Foreign Policy Survey Questions

Our long-standing survey questions measure topics such as willingness to build and use the military (Militarism), a preference for working through international organisations and building consensus (Multilateralism), withdrawing from global issues (Isolationism), and spending or redistributing funds to help the world's poor (Global Justice).

These already-existing questions permit us to explore views about feminism because feminism is not just aimed at achieving gender equality, women's rights, and the participation of women, but is also concerned with challenging the structures that drive gendered inequalities and insecurities, all of which are referenced in these questions.

Feminists argue that the root causes of gendered inequalities and insecurities include militarism, a competitive approach to international relations (the opposite of multilateralism), and an economic system that sees wealth accrue to elites, primarily in the global north (the opposite of global justice). We can see, then, that the long-standing questions can already yield results that can tell us something about the levels of enthusiasm Scots and English people might have for feminist approaches.

The survey of 4462 English and 2092 Scottish respondents fielded in October 2022 asked items our previous work shows is reflective of Militarism, another four reflective of Multilateralism, and three reflective of Global Justice.

Figure 1a lists the question wording and the percentage of respondents agreeing to the statement. The two left-hand bars compare Scottish to English respondents while the three right-hand bars show intra-Scotland differences based on the respondents' position on Scottish independence.

06. Figure 1a.

- Statement 1: The UK needs a strong military to be effective in international relations.
- Statement 2: The UK should take all steps including the use of force to prevent aggression by any expansionist power.
- Statement 3: The UK should do what is in its own interest, even if our allies object.
- Statement 4: The UK doesn't need to withdraw from international affairs, it just needs to stop letting international organizations tell us what we can and can't do.

Notes: Five item response choices range from Strongly Agree to Strongly Disagree. Strongly and Somewhat Agree responses combined in Figure.

06

Figure 1a, which reports agreement to the militarism questions repeats a pattern that appears across foreign policy topics. Although statistically significant, responses comparing Scottish and English respondents are not vastly different in magnitude. Majorities in both nations favour the need for a strong-military and the use of force. Majorities of English respondents and pluralities of Scottish respondents favour unilateralism or “going it alone” when necessary, given responses to Statements 3 and 4.

07. Further Figures

07

When it comes to militarism, we do not see, in the aggregate, strong confluence with feminist scepticism of utilizing force when the need arises. However, within Scotland, large differences on three of the four questions emerge by respondent positions on the independence question. Unionists in Scotland are far more militaristic than Scottish independence supporters, the latter of which display scepticism toward the need for a strong military and favour a more collaborative approach. Interestingly, those on the fence on the independence question have a pattern of responses to these questions closer to those favouring independence. Thus, anti-militarism is not a losing proposition for nationalist parties.

- Statement 1: The UK should work more through international organisations, like the UN.
- Statement 2: The best way for the UK to be a world leader in foreign affairs is to build international consensus.
- Statement 3: The UK should be more committed to diplomacy and not so fast to use the military in international crises.
- Statement 4: In deciding on its foreign policies, the UK should take into account the views of its major allies.

Notes: Five item response choices range from Strongly Agree to Strongly Disagree. Strongly and Somewhat Agree responses combined in Figure.

07. Further Figures (cont.)

07

In contrast to the questions measuring militarism, results presented in Figure 1b show there is clear consensus across all groups, English and Scottish, Unionist and Nationalist, who all endorse all questions concerning the value of diplomacy and working with or considering the views of allies and international organisations. The magnitude of the endorsement within Scotland does, however, show large differences, with those favouring independence being much more favourable towards working with the UN and in their commitment to diplomacy over military force. Scots who are undecided on the independence question fall closer to the Unionists than the Nationalists when it comes to supporting multilateralism, but again all groups are supportive of cooperating with other nations. This accords well with feminist ideas of collaboration over competition.

The British public shows low levels of agreement with the need to increase foreign aid and global wealth redistribution. Just more than three in ten Scottish and English respondents agree with the first two statements in Figure 1c, and near majorities in both countries agree that the UK does enough to help the world's poor. Again, there are within Scotland differences along the nationalist-unionist divide: Scottish Nationalists are significantly more likely than Unionists to agree with the first two statements and much more likely not to agree with the last negatively worded item.

Here, those who have not made up their minds about independence are closer in their levels of agreement on these questions to the Nationalists.

07. Further Figures (cont.)

07

- Statement 1: The UK should spend significantly more money on foreign aid.
- Statement 2: The UK should be more willing to share its wealth with other nations, even if it doesn't coincide with our political interests.
- Statement 3: The UK already does enough to help the world's poor.

Notes: Five item response choices range from Strongly Agree to Strongly Disagree. Strongly and Somewhat Agree responses combined in Figure.

o8. New Survey Items

o8

The Emerging Agenda from Feminist Foreign Policy Theory and New Survey Items

A feminist approach to foreign policy also tends to involve additional goals, with the broad objective of tackling gendered inequalities and insecurities. Importantly and in accord with feminist thought, these aims blur the boundaries between domestic and foreign policy.

The Scottish Government, in its development of a feminist approach, identified its initial three key areas of focus as “a just transition to net zero, economic justice and peace – each underpinned by human rights and gender equality.”

It set out to build on several elements of its efforts to be a Good Global Citizen:

- development of a Vision for Trade that includes a commitment to ensuring trade serves gender equality (as well as accords with human rights and environmental concerns);
- and efforts to ensure its international climate justice work recognises that those least responsible for the global climate emergency are being affected first and most severely by it, and that climate finance tackles existing inequalities;
- work toward decolonising international development (to recognise the role of colonialism in driving poverty and insecurity and, as covered by our existing Global Justice questions, to respond by transferring power and wealth to the Global South).

We added new questions to the survey to assess public opinion on some of these policies. The vision for trade and some aspects of the need for climate justice are the motivation behind three statements tapping what we call “Trade Justice” (Figure 2a). Here, we find high levels of support for incorporating human and women’s rights as well as environmental protection into trade agreements, with small levels of variation between England and Scotland. Again, Scottish Nationalists are more supportive than Unionists, but support is widespread for these statements. Levels of enthusiasm among the undecideds on independence are closer to those exhibited by Unionists than by Nationalists.

o8. New Survey Items (cont.)

o8

The last set of questions tap feelings about firstly, the UK's colonial legacy and, secondly, the shift away from the belief that economic growth is the sine qua non of human advancement.

Results presented in Figure 2b suggest some strong divides within Scotland. The idea that the UK should apologise for colonialism fails to receive majority support in both England and Scotland, but there are strong divides among Unionists and Nationalists within Scotland, with those undecided on Scottish independence falling in between.

- Statement 1: The UK should not sign trade agreements with other countries unless the agreement protects the environment.
- Statement 2: The UK should not sign trade agreements with other countries unless the agreement protects women's rights.
- Statement 3: The UK should not sign trade agreements with other countries unless the agreement protects human rights.

Notes: Five item response choices range from Strongly Agree to Strongly Disagree. Strongly and Somewhat Agree responses combined in Figure.

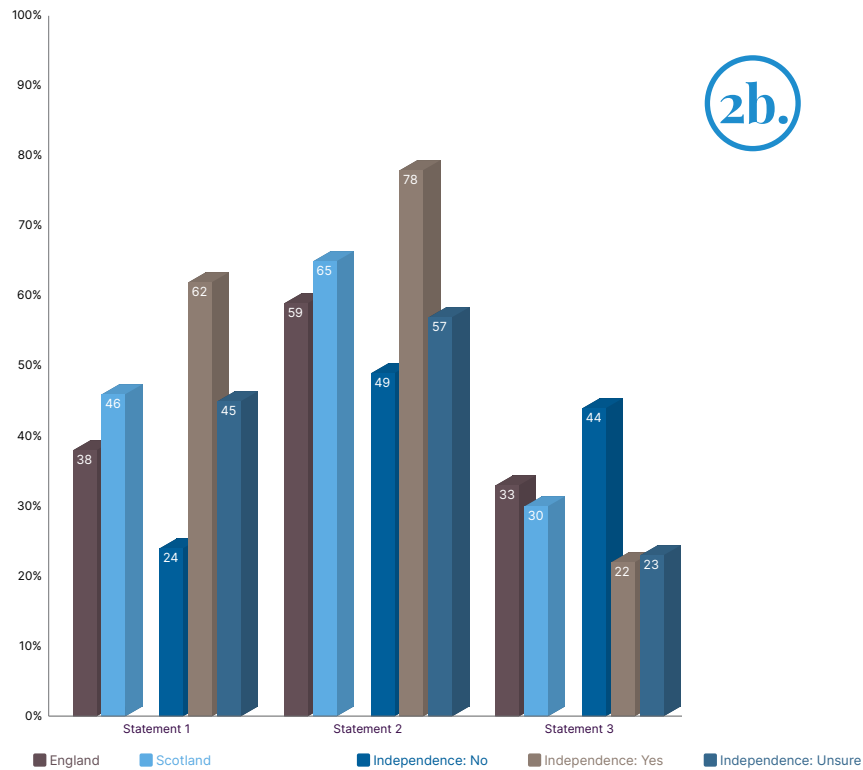

o8. New Survey Items (cont.)

o8

Interestingly, in contrast to the lack of support for post-colonial regrets, there is strong support across England and Scotland for rethinking the primacy of economic growth as a goal. Majorities in both nations support prioritizing human wellbeing over growth and do not believe that protecting the environment should be sacrificed on the altar of economic growth. Support within Scotland for alternatives to economic growth is particularly strong among those favouring Scottish independence. While respondents do not endorse feminist positions concerning Britain’s colonial legacy, they do favour a rethinking of how we measure progress that moves away from assuming a rise in economic growth tells us very much about the quality of people’s lives.

- Statement 1: The UK needs to apologise for its colonial legacy.
- Statement 2: The UK Government should make human wellbeing its priority, not economic growth.
- Statement 3: The UK Government should make economic growth its priority, not protecting the environment.

2b.

Notes: Five item response choices range from Strongly Agree to Strongly Disagree. Strongly and Somewhat Agree responses combined in Figure.

09. Conclusion

09

The fall 2022 survey of representative samples of English and Scottish respondents large enough to allow for cross-national and within-Scotland comparisons of the publics' foreign policy attitudes is one we understand to be the first of its kind.

Rather than a focus on the cross-national Scottish-English foreign policy differences, those interested in the SGs approach to paradiplomacy and a feminist approach to foreign policy are advised to pay attention to the significant differences of opinions between Scottish Unionists and Nationalists in the areas of existing and emerging foreign policy ideas. Those favouring Scottish independence show far more support than those who favour the Union when it comes to many of the core tenets espoused by the FaFP-informed agenda adopted by the SG. The para-diplomacy that the SNP-Green Power Sharing Government in Holyrood is developing does speak to many foreign policy preferences of both parties' supporters. However, as is the case with many domestic policy issues in Scotland, many foreign policy issues polarize along the Nationalist-Unionist divide.

Dr Claire Duncanson is a Senior Lecturer in International Relations at the School of Social and Political Science at the University of Edinburgh.

Dr Timothy B. Gravelle is a data scientist and an Adjunct Professor at Wilfrid Laurier University in Ontario.

Professor Thomas J Scotto is Professor of Politics at the University of Glasgow.

Scottish Council on Global Affairs
c/o Sir Alexander Stone building
University of Glasgow
Glasgow, G12 8QQ
Scotland, UK

Contact: John Edward john@scga.scot